When the service was over Mr. Lascelles gave notice that any of his parishioners who wished to speak to him--about their souls--would find him in the sacristy for an hour from that time, or for so much longer as he might be wanted. This too was a fitting occasion for the thin end, and he wished to gently insinuate it before he drove home the wedge with what he meant should prove to be irresistible force. He knew human nature so well 1 and he knew that when the senses have been stirred, as now, hearts are softened, consciences are awakened, and the reason is sent to sleep with fear, caution, and distrust And as he intended to establish confession as a practice of faith and duty, he thought he might as well begin with the alphabet to-day. He had already told Hermione and the Churchlands family what he intended to do, so far as receiving his parishioners in. the sacristy after service went; but he did not say even to them that he intended this as the beginning of weekly confession. He had merely asked Theresa to come in to him when service should be over; and to Hermione he had said, with friendly meaning and a graceful kind of partiality: -- Do you come the last of all, dear Mrs. Fullerton. Wait until the rest have gone and then come in. The prospect of this private conference had a...
