As a general rule to render crossing successful, we should endeavour to find some affinity of constitution between the improvers and those we wish to improve; sometimes the character of the wool denotes this affinity. Thus there is scarcely a breed of long-woolled sheep but what has been greatly improved by means of the Leicester ram, whilst it generally failed in effecting any permanent improvement in shortwoolled sheep, amongst which the South Downs have been far more successful. As a general rule, the first cross between a superior and an inferior race is very successful, producing animals approximating, in most respects, to their more improved parents, but after the first cross the breed usually deteriorates. It must, therefore, be borne in mind that crossing is an experiment sometimes succeeding and sometimes failing...
