Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Laboratory Directions in Chemistry I-A Measurement Of Volumes. Notes: Enter the date and the title of the exercise at the top of a page of the notebook. Use one side only of each page for recording experimental results and answering questions. Make calculation neatly at the bottom or side of the page, or on the opposite page. Show your notebook to your instructor each day until he is satisfied with your method of making entries. Each day, before leaving the laboratory; finish the experiments assigned for the days work, write out the answers to as many of the questions as possible, and clean the top of your desk. Before the next laboratory period finish the questions and problems, review your work and be sure that you understand it perfectly. Read over the laboratory notes on the next laboratory exercise. Experiment. Make several measurements of the inside diameter (in centimeters) of your medium-sized beaker. (The instructor will suggest a method.) Record each measurement in your notebook as soon as it is made. The beakers are not perfectly cylindrical, nor is the method very accurate; the measurements, therefore, will usually show variations of a few tenths of a centimeter. An average of at least four measurements will give the mean diameter to about 0.1 cm. Questions: What fraction of the diameter is this error? What percent of the diameter is this error? Experiment. Fill the beaker with water to just below the flare. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
